He was assisted by the Manchester and Lipscomb police in his efforts to capture the would-be murderer. There was a rumor on the street yesterday morning that the negro Ben Burton, who was made sick by eating of the bacon made from the poison, was dead. A reporter called at Dr. Bull's house, No. 57, on Thirty-fifth street, but was told the Doctor was away and would not be back. The reporter then went to the Hotel Belmont, Sixty-second and Central Park west, where Mrs. Blaine lives with her parents and her young son, James G. Blaine. The colored servant in attendance said Mrs. Blaine was at home and took the reporter's card. In a few moments he returned and said: "Mrs. Blaine had gone out about half an hour before." The reporter called into the office at that moment, motioned the reporter aside and said:

"Mrs. Blaine is not receiving any cards. She won't say anything." Then, with a slight inclination of the head and a wistful look: "I guess it's all right. There's doubt in my mind but it's all right. Of course that is between us."

The fact that more than an ordinary friendship has existed for some time between young Mrs. Blaine and her physician is well known. It is also known that Dr. Bull is a man of means and has no time to treat Mrs. Blaine after other eminent physicians have pronounced her case hopeless and had stated that the acute attack of inflammatory rheumatism with which she was seized when she was about to make her debut upon the stage must result in her being confined to bed.

The Doctor remained to see Mrs. Blaine until midnight, and his treatment saved her from the life-long torture to which the other doctors had practically consigned her. She is not a well woman to-day, but she is far from what she would have been had not met Dr. William T. Bull, who came to her aid with Dr. Bull.

Mrs. Blaine was so loquacious a woman that she was soon seen from the window of her room, and the neighbors soon learned that she was a Catholic priest, the Rev. Father Diney, at his home in Twenty-ninth street, in the fall of 1886. It was a precipitate marriage, and aroused the anger of the Blaine family. Two years later, mother and daughter separated, and a year ago Marie Nevin Blaine secured a divorce from her husband in Dakota, he putting in no defense.
